

No.

There should be no mandate that all HDTV receivers implement copy protection when a 'broadcast flag' is detected in the received television signal.

This would stop my ability to time shift (record 'Friends' while I'm at the office to watch after I get home). I believe that the movie and tv peopel went to court about this 20 or so years ago after the VCR came out and it was decided by the courts that time sharing was legal. So why stop it now?

How does this mandate help me? It only hurt me. That's why I say "NO!"

Thank you,
